Problematic :

Algeria was at an important turn point in 2012 with the development of the audio-visual media system, following the announcement by the State of the Organic Law No. 12.05 of 12 January 2012, which proclaimed the free establishment of private audio-visual media organizations. As a result, financial and business people together with media experts have joined their efforts to create a variety of TV channels either of general themes or special ones such as El Hadhaf El Riyadhia, El Nahar, et El Chourouk News, etc.

With the launch of these channels, there were a number of media faces, most of which were new young journalists, or journalists who moved from public television channels or those with experience from the press. This fresh start launch was described as a timid one, but gradually things have changed and adopted bolder policy stance in various areas coverage, so many programs have sought to break the taboos and address topics that have been a long time ago banned to be discussed by the different media means. All of this has generated much debate at the social level through a collective indignation at in front of the level of boldness at which these programs have reached on social media and even the ban or the suspension of many programs due to political orders , even going so far to a temporary or final closure of some channels, so between media practices and work ethics , the present problematic aims at examining media practice reality of the Algerian private TV channels , by an answering the following principal question:
