

Foreword:

There is no doubt that orientalists have made the greatest efforts in what could come under the so-called: "Dialogue among civilizations". Many researchers have paused to consider and evaluate these efforts. They were divided into two doctrines: those who support orientalism and see no flaws or deficiencies in it, and those who oppose it and see only flaws and negatives. Each of these, regardless of their scientific approach or how different they are, are in the same crucible, namely that orientalism occurred as a result of theoretical and practical reasons that persist to this day. Therefore, objective dealing with it in lesson and assessment is a scientific requirement that must be met.

It is also incontrovertible that orientalism has a significant impact on both the Western and Muslim world. No one who writes about, thinks about, or performs an act associated with the East can overcome the constraints imposed by orientalism on freedom of thought or action in this area. This confirms the well-established fact that the foundation of Orientalism has been and continues to be an integral part of the issue of the civilizational conflict between the West and the East, and it can even be said that Orientalism represents the intellectual background of this conflict.

From its very beginning and throughout the ages, orientalism has played a leading role in shaping and drawing the image of the East in general and Islam in particular, and in instilling it in the consciousness of the Western man in order to touch and guide his thoughts and feelings in a certain direction, as well as to paint a distorted image of the East. To this end, he has focused his studies on various areas such as: creed, sharia, language, ancient languages, dialects, ethnicity, geography, economy, politics, sociology, customs, and traditions, etc.
